A THEATRICAL ROMANCE.

They sometimes tell a good story in Chicago, and one recently related about a leading actor in that city is well worth rehearsal. The gentleman was young and handsome, and was generally gaged before the footlights in a series of the most heroic achievements. He never appeared except with the most beautiful sentiments in his mouth; and always wore most gorgeous doublet and hose.
As commonly happens with an actor who plays the lion's part, many romantic ladies were in love with him. Of these one was not content to let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on her damask cheek. She wrote the actor a letter intimating delicately but clearly that he had made a conquest of her heart, and telling him that at the matinee on the next Saturday afternoon he would see her sitting in the front row of the dress circle, section F, No. 39.
"I shall occupy the same seat every Saturday afternoon, so you will always know where to look for me," said the fair letter-writer, and then added, "I trust you are an honorable gentleman, and will keep the receipt of this letter a secret." The epistle was signed with the mellifluous name of Sadie Lathrop.
Now, the actor who cut such a dashing appearance on the stage was a sober and virtuous family man, who had for a wife the leading lady of the company, one of those determined little women before whom it has ever been the fate of Adam and sons of Adam to bow down in obedience. She captured the letter from his enamored correspondent, and securely confident in her own supremacy, waited for her vengeance after the cynical manner of little women in general.
A second letter came from the hapless Sadie Lathrop, in which, after some soft nonsense in regard to the sweetness of her "dear Eugene's" name, she proposed a meeting at the corner of Dearborn and Adams streets, at nightfall on Monday, and promised to appear in seat 39, section F, of the dress circle, on Thursday evening. But the actor failed to keep the appointment, of course, and the lovelorn dame had to forego the pleasure of her visit to the theater on Thursday, as it was Thanksgiving day.
She was not discouraged, however, but dispatched another letter, in which she suggested excuses for the recent swimmer's absence, and gave more particular directions in regard to another rendezvous.
"In order," said the confiding but un-grammatical creature, "that you will more readily know that it is me, and that you make no mistake, I will wear a white handkerchief round my neck." Failing an interview, she renewed her promise to be at the next Saturday matinee "in the same seat that I told you before. No. 39, section F, dress circle." The actor's wife read this announcement with the satisfaction of a cat that is watching for her prey and hears the mouse gnawing. The eventful afternoon came, and husband and wife appeared upon the stage as hero and heroine, while in seat No. 39, section F, dress circle, sat a gorgeously arrayed woman with a white silk handkerchief about her neck, shining as a signal, like Navarre's plume. It was in the wife's lines, she took the part of an actress—to invite her admirer to see her play.
"Come and see me, Major, won't you?" she said sweetly. "Oh, yes, I'll buy a season ticket," answered the gallant Major. And then the mischievous little woman, starting directly at her conspicuous rival, got off this preposterous gag:
"Do, and be sure you sit in section F, No. 39, and wear a white handkerchief round your neck so that I may be sure to know you." The result is best told by giving one of the letters directed to her husband, which the spiteful little vixen opened in Monday's mail:
"You were all very much amused on Saturday afternoon, were you not? I supposed you were a gentleman, but I now realize that I was mistaken. I saw you as a favor to let no one know of the letters I wrote you, and contrary to my wishes, there was not one of the company but what knew of it and the seat I was to occupy. But I think you were all a little fooled, as I did not occupy No. 39, section 'F,' as Miss Norton so facetiously remarked. I gave my ticket to a friend, and occupied a seat on the opposite side of the house. For I was afraid something, I did not know what, would be said or done which I did not like, and I was right in my surmise.
My friend did not know what to think—she questioned me, and I told her the mention of the number of the seat she occupied was probably a coincidence.
This will be my last letter to you, and I have to say is that I now have as much antipathy, aversion—bated—repugnance, contempt and abhorrence as I formerly had respect—esteem—and the greatest difference. I shall not annoy you any more with my letters or my presence at the museum. Trusting you will show this to all your kindred spirits, I remain, with loathing and contempt, your most inveterate foe, Sadie Lathrop should go and be a nun, for the world is hollow, and actors' calves are stuffed with saw-dust.
